Full description

Lonquimay, at 2,890 meters, rises within the Malalcahuello-Nalcas National Reserve. During the ascent, we traverse volcanic landscapes of sand, rock, and snow, and the guide explains the geological history of the area, including the Navidad crater, which was formed during the Christmas Day eruption of 1988.

From the summit, you can see much of the Araucanía mountain range, with its volcanoes and araucaria trees. We set out at 4 a.m. and return around 8 p.m. The hike is of medium-to-high difficulty, open to participants ages 17 and up, with one guide and one assistant for every four people.

What's included
